

NINA RICCI

THE NINA RICCI HOUSE

Robert Ricci founded the Maison Nina Ricci in 1932 for his mother Nina, a widely respected couturière.

Robert Ricci, a young advertising entrepreneur and a co-founder of Studios Harcourt, oversaw business development for the family-owned company while his mother focused on creating Haute Couture fashions. Renowned for her personalized attention to each of her clients, Ricci preferred to highlight each woman's unique personality rather than design for an idealized woman. Nina Ricci's style was one of magnificent simplicity, unerring tastefulness and beautiful craftsmanship. Rich colors and discreet details, such as lacing, flowers and ribbons, brought freshness and gaiety to rigorously-cut clothes. Her fashions conquered the Parisian elite as well as American starlets. A distinctive figure herself, Madame Ricci became a legendary figure of the era. Thanks to her affinity for the color white, she became known as "la Dame blanche" ("the White lady"); to her seamstresses she was "the Queen".

In 1941, Robert Ricci created the Maison's perfume department. A man of taste, he participated in creating fragrances and collaborated with a number of artists including the illustrators Christian Bérard and Dimitri Bouchène as well as the crystal maker Marc Lalique. Cœur Joie launched in 1946, followed shortly thereafter by l'Air du Temps (1948). In 1951, the latter was produced with the immediately recognizable two-dove bottle, a symbol of love, peace and hope, values that Nina Ricci held dear.

Driven by the growth of the perfume business and evolving modes of production, the fashion world was changing. The brand needed to develop internationally, yet Madame Ricci was advancing in years. Young designers came to her assistance and in 1954 Jules-François Crahay was appointed design director. He introduced abstraction and geometric lines to the Ricci style. The popularity of his fashions culminated in widespread acclaim, notably for his Crocus suit in 1959. In 1962, he created Mademoiselle Ricci, a collection made exclusively for the American market.

Gérard Pipart succeeded Jules-François Crahay in 1964. The young ready-to-wear designer, a virtuoso of Haute Couture, brilliantly continued his predecessor's work. Pipart's very feminine style echoed the richness of the materials used and conveyed his mastery of extraordinary volumes. Building on its success, the House moved to Paris's Golden Triangle, opening in 1979 a flagship at the corner of 39 Avenue Montaigne and 17 Rue François 1er. The Couture and Perfume divisions were brought together under one roof. On the ground floor of the Avenue Montaigne, the house opened its second boutique.

In 1987, the perfume Nina, Robert Ricci's last project, was created in homage to his late mother. The brand became inextricably linked with imagery created by photographer David Hamilton, a collaboration that would last for more than twenty years. In the years that followed, numerous contemporary artists continued to perpetuate and renew this cultural tradition.

1998 marked a turning point: the Spanish perfume group Puig, its long-time distributor in the Spanish market, acquired the Maison Nina Ricci. The Puig family's intention: to perpetuate the spiritual legacy of Robert Ricci by focusing on creativity and exceptional design.

The group named Nathalie Gervais artistic director of Nina Ricci ready-to-wear collections. The designer's arrival marked a new era. She injected the brand with clear modernity and self-assured femininity. Later, other designers such as Olivier Theyskens would offer their own variations on this new emancipated and confident woman.

Peter Copping was named creative director in 2009. With grace and a light touch, he revisited the image of this Parisian institution. He revived the spirit of a feminine Nina Ricci style, which is often perceived as the foundation of the brand's identity. Season after season, he continues to redefine the Maison's wardrobe. Copping's collections are elegant and refined, with special attention paid to detail and the quality of materials and silhouettes that are resolutely contemporary and modern.

Guillaume Henri joined the House as Creative Director in 2015. His first collection, Fall Winter 2015-16, will be presented in March 2015.
